another trial in Wichita.

"I just think, judge, that we're going to have a trial wreck if you hurry this to November," Treadway said.

Belot agreed to delay the trial, but he said he couldn't stick with an April 2009 trial date that had been set by another judge.

"I realize this is a difficult case, but these defendants are presently in custody," Belot said. "I want them to have a speedy trial. I want the government to have a speedy trial."

"I'm not going to push it back to April. That's just too long,"

Treadway and defense lawyer Lawrence Williamson, who represents Stephen Schneider, indicated they would support sending potential jurors in the case short questionnaires to ask such basic questions as whether they have ever been treated by Stephen Schneider. Jurors in criminal cases often are excluded when they know the defendant.

"Mr. Williamson might be of the opinion that former patients would be good jurors," Belot said.

"I might have to argue that one," Treadway said.

ZONES

for a prostitution offense is six months in jail and a $1,000 fine. In the zone, a violation can carry a penalty of a year in jail and a $2,500 fine, Lee said.

Council members Paul Gray and Jeff Longwell expressed concern that enhanced penalties could force prostitutes to migrate to another part of town.

Longwell questioned why the city couldn't simply increase penalties throughout the community.

Lee responded that the penalties can be toughened only in areas with a history of prostitution.

And he said he doesn't think the problem will migrate to a significant extent because prostitutes and their clients tend to gravitate to commercial areas that are known for such activity and that have large numbers of low-cost motels.

No one tracks the problem - called "big black dog syndrome" - nationally, and shelters often keep only limited data on the sizes, breeds and colors of the dogs that are adopted or euthanized, according to the Humane Society of the United States and the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

COLOR

Even black cats can suffer from the discrimination. Campbell said black felines tend to get ignored more than kitties of other colors.

People who come to the shelter wanting to adopt a cat usually have a color preference, she said.

"They'll say, 'I want an orange cat,' or 'I want a calico kitty,' instead of choosing a pet based on its personality and how well it will fit into their lifestyle," she said.

"There's so much variety out there with companion animals, and sometimes the black animals are overlooked."

It doesn't help that a quirk of dark-dog biology has led to an overabundance of large black dogs, said Alex Yaffe, who founded Heartland Lab Rescue, a network for rescuing abandoned Labrador retrievers in Oklahoma. Labradors and pit bulls tend to have big litters of five or more, which increases overpopulation.

One black dog, Coal, took more than six months to find a home despite a sweet temperament, excellent recommendations and a featured spot on Yaffe's Web site. "That was just black," Yaffe said. "He was his own person."

The Web site blackpearldogs.com, a resource devoted to increasing public awareness of the "big black dog phenomenon," offers some lighthearted reasons to adopt a big, black dog: Their color doesn't clash with furniture or clothing, hides dirt well, and is easy to accessorize. In other words, black dogs could be the new black.
